Preface

It was in 1863 when Rudolf Virchow hypothesized in thirty published lectures on “Die krankhaften Geschwülste” that the origin of cancer was at sites of chronic inflammation. Tumors in liver and gut seem to originate particularly often from persistent viral infection or other chronic inflammatory disorders. In particular, chronic Hepatitis B and C may cause hepatocellular carcinoma and colon cancer develops more frequently in patients with inflammatory bowel disease. Pro-inflammatory cytokines such as TNF and IL-6 may destroy tissue thereby maintaining chronic inflammation. In addition, they could act as survival factors and induce angiogenic factors and growth factors critical for regeneration and wound healing. If concomitant mutations and gene amplifications cannot be repaired, these mechanisms of inflammation and regulation of inflammation favor development and growth of a tumor. Pro-inflammatory cytokines also induce chemokines that may attract regulatory T cells (Tregs) or tumor-associated macrophages (TAMs) into the tumor. Increasing knowledge of the mechanisms connecting chronic inflammation to tumorigenesis and tumor progression might have implications for prevention and treatment of cancer. A good example is the proteasome inhibitor bortezomib, which has been approved for cancer treatment and prevents activation of the transcription factor NF- κ B, which is common in inflammatory pathways.

We are very happy to welcome selected experts in the fields of viral hepatitis, cytokine signalling, immune regulation and tumorigenesis in the gastrointestinal tract to the Falk Workshop on “Inflammation & Cancer”. Under the guidance of competent chairmen you will have the opportunity to discuss these important topics.

We are looking forward to welcoming you in Hamburg.
